HAIR RESTORATION

When Kent McCarter says he has taken hair restoration to an art form, you can believe him. This is one man for whom his artistic talents seep into nearly every corner of his life.

As owner of The Wild Hair Studio in Greenville, Kent spends his days giving people back their natural hairline using the latest non-surgical method available – transdermal hair restoration. This process applies a second skin to the scalp, which Kent compares to a contact lens in that clients don't feel it once applied. He caters to men, women and children, anyone who wants a natural looking head of hair.

Kent, a Winthrop graduate, has been cutting hair since he was 16, under the tutelage of his grandfather, Walt McCarter, a long-time Greer barber. He became intrigued with hair restoration after his own hair started thinning. After 21 years experience, Kent has become one of the leading hair restoration specialists in the U.S.

Kent and wife Wendy recently finished construction on their Lake Lyman home, which they share with two kids, Daniel and Carol Anna. But Kent doesn't spend all his spare time relaxing on the water – he's often in his studio working on his paintings of wildlife and scenic views.
